

Your website is live.

Here is what I built, what it is already doing for you in Google, and the handful of things only you can do to make it work harder.

clinepropertymgmt.com

Live, secure, and open to Google. Everything below is done and running unless I have marked it as something I need from you.

What is on the site

27 pages	A page for each of your seven services, plus home, gallery, about and contact. Each service page is written to be found on its own.
10 communities	Your service area is spelled out, including the part people get wrong: mowing is Whitestown, Zionsville and West Carmel only, while your other six services cover all ten.
48 photographs	Sorted by service, every one your own work, with the before-and-after pairs on sliders people can drag.
3 video clips	Short and silent. They do not load until someone scrolls to them, so they never slow the site down.

What I did so people can find you

Search ranking is mostly unglamorous plumbing. Here is the plain-English version of what is in place.

An address of your own

The site sits on clinepropertymgmt.com with a security certificate, so browsers show it as safe. Google will not seriously rank a site living on a borrowed address, so this had to come first.

A page per service, per town

Somebody searching “lawn mowing Zionsville” and somebody searching “commercial snow removal” are two different customers. Each service has its own page with its own title and description, so Google has something specific to show each of them rather than dumping everyone on the home page.

Business details Google can read directly

Behind the scenes every page carries structured data — a summary written for Google rather than for people. It states your business type, your services, your service area, your phone number and your FAQs. This is what lets Google show extra detail under your listing instead of a plain blue link.

A map of the site, submitted to Google

There is a sitemap listing all 12 public pages, and it includes 38 of your photographs so they can surface in Google Images. For a business whose work is this visual, image search is a real way to get found. The site is also verified with Google Search Console, the dashboard that reports how you are doing.

Fast, and correct on a phone

Most people will see this on a phone, standing in their own yard. It is built as plain fast pages with compressed images, and I have checked layout and colour contrast on phone, tablet and desktop. Google measures speed and mobile usability directly, so this counts twice: better for your customers, and better for ranking.

A summary file for AI assistants

More people now ask ChatGPT and similar tools for recommendations. I have added a file that hands those tools a clean summary of your services and service area, so if one is asked who mows in Zionsville it has accurate information rather than a guess. Being straight with you: this is a new convention and no search engine promises to use it. It cost nothing and it may pay off.

What I need from you

This is the honest part. The site is built about as well as a site can be built. What is left has to come from you — and between them, these are worth more than everything above.

1 Switch the contact form on — this week

Until you do this, every enquiry from the website is thrown away.

- Someone submits the form once. That first one does not reach you — it triggers a confirmation email instead.
- You get an email asking you to confirm. Check spam and the Promotions tab, it often lands there.
- Click the link. That is it, once and for all.
- Then submit the form again to check a real enquiry arrives. Hit reply on it too — that should go straight back to the customer.
- Every enquiry has [Cline Web] in the subject, so one Gmail filter catches them all.

2 Set up your Google Business Profile — this week

Worth more than everything else on this page put together.

- Go to business.google.com and search your business name first, in case a listing already exists you can claim.
- Set it up as a service-area business, not a storefront. List all ten communities.
- Main category: Lawn Care Service. Add Snow Removal Service and Pressure Washing Service as extras.
- Use exactly the same business name, phone number and website address as the site. Google cross-checks these and mismatches count against you.
- You will have to prove it is really you, usually by postcard or phone. Only you can do this part.

Why this one matters most. When somebody searches “lawn mowing near me”, Google shows a map with three businesses on it above the normal results. That map is fed by Business Profiles, not by websites. Without one you are invisible in the place most local customers actually look.

3 Get me three to five reviews — this month

The biggest gap on the site, and it affects your ranking as well.

- Ask customers you have looked after for years. They are usually glad to.
- First name and town is plenty — “Sarah M., Zionsville”.
- Google reviews are worth more than anything written on the site, because they count towards where you appear on that map.
- There are no reviews anywhere on the site right now. I left that space empty rather than write something you did not say.

4 Photographs I am still missing

Two gaps stand out, and one is probably costing you commercial work.

- Snow. One driveway or lot, photographed covered in snow and again once you have cleared it, from the same spot both times. That pairing is the strongest possible advert for snow work and it drops straight into the site.
- You, your crew, or a truck with your name on it. There is currently not one photograph of a person or a vehicle on the whole site. For a trade business that is the biggest trust gap after reviews.
- Anything from December to February. Your year-round pitch is thin on winter.

5 Details only you can confirm

The site states these as fact. If any is wrong, tell me and I will change it.

- Are you insured, and can you produce a certificate on request? Property managers ask before you set foot on site.
- Snow: is two inches your actual trigger depth? Same for commercial and residential?
- Do you offer both seasonal snow contracts and per-event billing?
- Do you actually clear gutters? It is currently listed under fall cleanups.
- Municipal work — do you contract directly, or through a general contractor?
- Your business hours, and how many years you have been going. Both would strengthen the site and neither is on it.

What to expect, and when

WHEN	WHAT HAPPENS
First 1–2 weeks	Google finds and files the pages. Do not read an empty dashboard as a problem — a brand-new address takes time.
Weeks 2–6	You start appearing for specific searches. Usually your business name first, then service-plus-town phrases.
Month 2 onward	Rankings build slowly. This is where the Business Profile and reviews do the heavy lifting, not the website.

Search ranking is not a switch. It is slow accumulation, and the things that move it fastest for a local trade business are a Business Profile, real reviews, and a site that loads fast and says clearly what you do and where. Three of those four are done.

Anything on this list you would rather I handled, send it over and I will do it. The five items above are the ones that genuinely have to come from you.
